Whitney is half-Dutch and half-Dutch American (double Dutch). He is also a fourth generation artist. His Dutch great grandfather, Floris Arntzenius, known for his paintings of cityscapes in the rain, was a contemporary of van Gogh and a member of The Hague School. His work is in a number of prominent Dutch museums and collections. Recently in the Netherlands a street was named after him, and Sotheby's held a solo exhibition of his work in Amsterdam. Whitney's grandmother was a successful still life and portrait painter. His mother is an actively collected painter of still lifes and landscapes. His sister is a textile designer and painter in London.

On his American side, he is related to James Whitney Fosburgh, whose portrait of Truman Capote hangs in the New York Public Library at 42nd Street, and Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney, founder of the Whitney Museum. His father worked for Pan American Airways (Pan Am), which took Whitney around the world from ages six to twenty, including four years at a traditional English boarding school. He is the father of two daughters: Elektra, who grew up in India and attends art college in California, and Lara, who lives in Israel and attends an arts high school.

Whitney has worked, lived and studied in Japan, England, Holland, France and India. He speaks American English, British English, French and a touch of Dutch. Whitney has recently visited and found inspiration in England, Netherlands, Germany, France, Egypt, Israel, Cuba, Ecuador, Mexico, Cameroon, India, Singapore, Myanmar (Burma), Vietnam, Laos, Taiwan, and Japan, and will soon in New Zealand. He is working towards a show in New York called: "Whitney at the Whitney".
